ABSTRACT

This study focuses on the language use among the indigenous communities in Baduy Luar and Cireundeu. The research investigates language use differences across various domains within Baduy Luar and Cireundeu communities, employing Fishman's (1972) theoretical framework about the domain of language use. Additionally, the study explores the potential for language maintenance and shift in these traditional villages based on Fasold's (1984) theory about language maintenance and shift. The research methodology employs a descriptive qualitative method and secondary data. The findings indicate that the Sundanese language remains dominant in both traditional villages in the intimate domain, although some variations occur in the transactional, educational, and workplace domains. Despite these variations, the study underscores the resilience of the Sundanese, preserving cultural identity and traditions. The recommendation drawn from this study for further research is to comprehend the impact of external factors and global changes on language dynamics in the communities of Baduy Luar and Cireundeu.
