ABSTRACT

ISIS AS REPRESENTED IN THEIR OWN DISCOURSE: A REPRESENTATIONAL STUDY OF MAGAZINES RELEASED BY ISIS

Supervisor: Eri Kurniawan, M.Ed., Ph.D.

This study was conducted to examine the strategies used by ISIS to represent themselves and the signification of the representations. Van Leeuwen's (2008) Social Actor Representation was applied to achieve the said purposes. This study collected its data from magazines released by ISIS in English named Dabiq and Rumiyah. Two articles from Rumiyah and one article from Dabiq were examined. The first article was taken from Rumiyah and was directed at ISIS internals and supporters. The second article, also from Rumiyah, was directed at both ISIS internals/supporters and their enemies. Finally, the third article from Dabiq was aimed at the enemies of ISIS. The findings show that ISIS use both exclusion and inclusion strategies to represent themselves. In terms of inclusion, personalisation – impersonalisation, activation – passivation, genericisation – specification, association, differentiation – indifferentiation, and categorisation – nomination are used to represent themselves. This study discovered that ISIS are very open about their violence which is justified through their identity building, claim of practicing the most correct form of Islam, and narrative of crisis. It was also found that women are underrepresented and men are presented as hyper-masculine. It is recommended for future studies to utilise van Leeuwen's (2008) Social Actor Representation to further examine ISIS and their communiqués in areas rendered impossible for this research due to its limitations. This include comparing ISIS produced materials with other sources, studying other forms of ISIS communiqués such as bulletins, and ISIS cultural materials such as poetry.
